

The terms forestry and logging are often used interchangeably to describe "Timber Insurance" but they are actually two different coverages with just a few areas that overlap. CIMXag will make sure you are using the appropriate policy to cover the needs of your timber business whether your trade practices fall under "Logging Insurance" or Forestry Insurance".

CIMXag is dedicated to understanding the types of Timber Insurance to ensure you and your business are protected. Our top priority is for you to feel confident and successful.

See the differences and make sure your timber business is fully covered

Forestry Insurance

Forestry insurance covers general logging operations, but more specifically covers timberland and the processes that go into converting timber into a product. Establishments from individual farmers to paper mills are covered under Forestry Insurance. Forestry insurance covers heavy equipment and also incorporates the potential for natural disasters. While Forestry Insurance covers things such as equipment damage in arboriculture, "Forest Insurance" (and in some cases your business might need both) protects you from "loss of trees" due to vandalism, natural disasters or animal interference.

Logging Insurance

Logging Insurance manages the risks of day-to-day activities of a timber business. From "loading and unloading" coverage, "power line damage" coverage to "accidental overcut" coverage, these needs are specific to loggers which is why they are not always covered under general Forestry Insurance.

While Forestry and Logging Insurance have their differences, they both provide general coverage for:

- Liability
- Workmans' Comp
- Heavy Equipment
